Politics and the political have long been a crucial area of anthropological inquiry. In its broadest sense, the term 'political' refers to a contentious dimension present in, or indeed constitutive of, all social relations (Foucault 1982; Mouffe 2005). More narrowly, 'politics' is used to describe the specific strategies social actors use to achieve their goals in competition with others, or modes of intervening, 'arts of government' (e.g., Gledhill 2000; Vincent 1994, 2005). Anthropology's key contribution to the multi-disciplinary study of the political rests with our discipline's hallmark method: ethnography. The power of ethnography to pin down that elusive object, 'the political', to feel for its boundaries and substance in ways more tactile, more concrete, and at once more open to serendipity and surprise than allowed for by other kinds of sociological inquiry, is widely recognized today across the neighbouring disciplines (e.g., Schatz 2009). In this conference, we invite ethnographers – anthropologists and not only – to join a conversation on how the political variously materializes in social life.
