"Tomasz Rakowski [10] presents a theoretically reflective and empirically rich ethnographic study of 'the degraded' in three geographical locales in Poland which were ravaged by change... [His] study does these people justice and represents a significant intellectual achievement." — Slavonic and East European Review

"Rakowski has produced a haunting and beautiful book. The ethnographic writing is extraordinary. It is an unusual skill, to be able to write about degradation but also to convey the dignity of individual lives. Anyone interested in postsocialism, poverty, or economic anthropology more generally should read this book." — Journal of Anthropological Research
