Intercultural Bilingual Education in the Peruvian Andes: the silencing of the indigenous Quechua language, a consequence of the coloniality of power

Colonial power is not over. It permeates post-colonial societies, as it continues to disrupt indigenous ways of living. The silencing of specific aspects of indigenous identities, such as the Quechua language in the Peruvian Andes, is only one of its repercussions. The inherent disavowal of the indigenous Other through the endorsement of a fundamentally racist and discriminatory Peruvian education in the 20th century, has prevented the establishment of Intercultural Bilingual Education programmes to thrive amongst the Quechua Andean indigenous communities. The latter have contributed to this trend by opposing teachers who attempted to implement the education inclusive of the Quechua language and culture by widely rejecting it. The presentation will dwell on the controversial aspect of the “Peruvian Anomaly” exposing how a violent, discriminatory and racially imbued legacy has crashed a sense of self-identification with the indigenous Quechua language amongst its speakers, which has further fomented racial
